Frontier Airlines service between Denver and Hayden — originally expected by ski season but held up by Federal Aviation Administration approval — now faces an additional hurdle.

The European Union's aviation safety authority called for a "crisis meeting" this week regarding the safety of Bombardier Q-400 turboprop planes. Frontier has purchased 10 of the same planes to increase its regional service out of Denver through its subsidiary, Lynx Aviation.

On Saturday, a Q-400 operated by Scandinavian airline SAS crash landed in Copenhagen, Denmark, with a landing gear malfunction. Although there were no serious injuries, it was the third such incident in seven weeks and sixth overall involving the Q-400.

Frontier hoped to launch Lynx this month, but delays in federal certification have pushed the company's estimated launch to December. Although the airline has not officially announced that Yampa Valley Regional Airport will be included in its
