Beetle-Killed Trees Causes Campground Closures

Denver Colo. July 1, 2009— Forest Service officials concerned about visitor and employee safety have identified campgrounds and picnic areas that will be closed for the season or experience delayed openings due to hazards caused by bark-beetle killed trees and heavy snow closing roads. Fourteen out of 223 recreation sites, mainly campgrounds and picnic areas across three National Forests in northern Colorado and southeastern Wyoming will be closed, and five will experience delayed openings this summer due to the bark beetle epidemic (see the attached list for details). The epidemic will likely require further treatments at additional recreation sites. Some roads have also been closed due to washouts after heavy snowmelt and some high elevation campgrounds are still covered with snow. The closures and delays will occur on the Arapaho and Roosevelt, Medicine Bow and Routt and the White River, National Forests. Campers should check the status of their desired campground before leaving home.

“Public safety is our number one priority. Beetle-killed trees can fall anytime. Visitors need to be aware of their surroundings and weather conditions in areas where trees have been killed by the mountain pine beetle,” said Cal Wettstein, commander of the Rocky Mountain Region Bark Beetle Incident Management Team.

Some other reminders for campers concern fire safety and illegal fireworks. Fire danger on the National Forests is starting to pick up with warmer weather and so everyone needs make sure campfires are out before leaving. All fireworks are illegal on the National Forests.

A number of forest campgrounds have already had beetle-killed hazard trees removed, which has opened up great views, but made them very sunny. Campers may want to create some shade by bringing a canopy, umbrella or other shelter. In spite of the closures and delays, there are still many great places to camp and explore on the National Forests. To check the status of any campground, visit www.fs.fed.us/r2/recreation/camping/campgroundlist, or call the local Forest Service office for more information. Reservations for most campgrounds can be made on www.recreation.gov or by calling 1-877-444-6777. For general information about the bark beetle epidemic go to www.fs.fed.us/r2/bark-beetle.
